Tennent, "Nemo" Coleman, Walter Hunt, Phillip "Goat" Randolph, Stephen Adams, Allen Williamson, Dewey Hunt, and John Hunter. 1910

333 Montford Avenue. Montford had a period of decline when many of the homes were divided into rooming houses or split into apartments. Renovations began around the late 1970s when Montford became a historic district and bed and breakfast inns sprang up in the larger homes. 1990

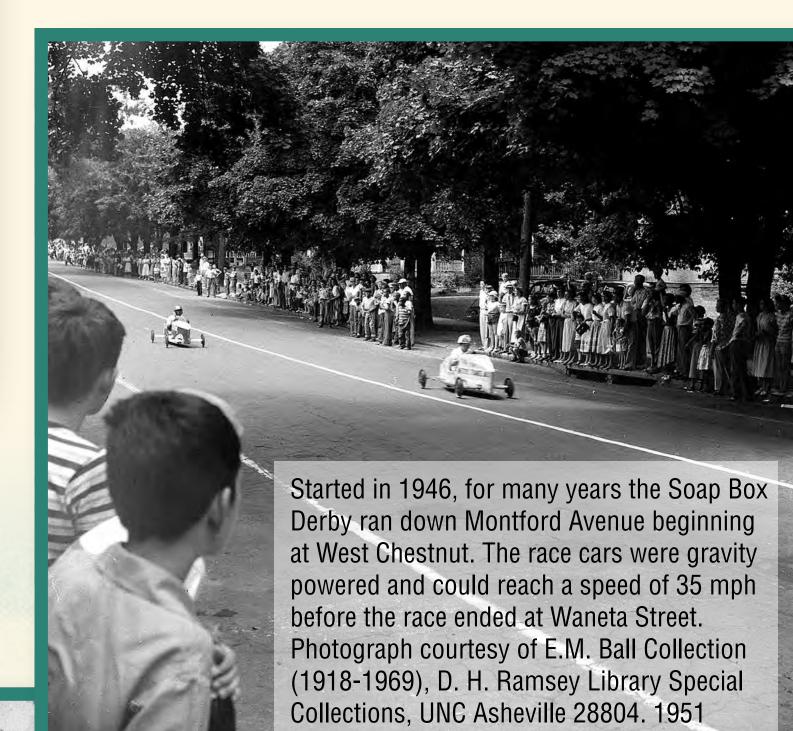

Stone mounting block for horse-drawn carriages (uppin' block) at the bottom of the steps leading up to 199 Montford Avenue. In the era of horse-drawn carriages, boarding passengers stepped up on the block to give them a boost up into the carriage. 2009

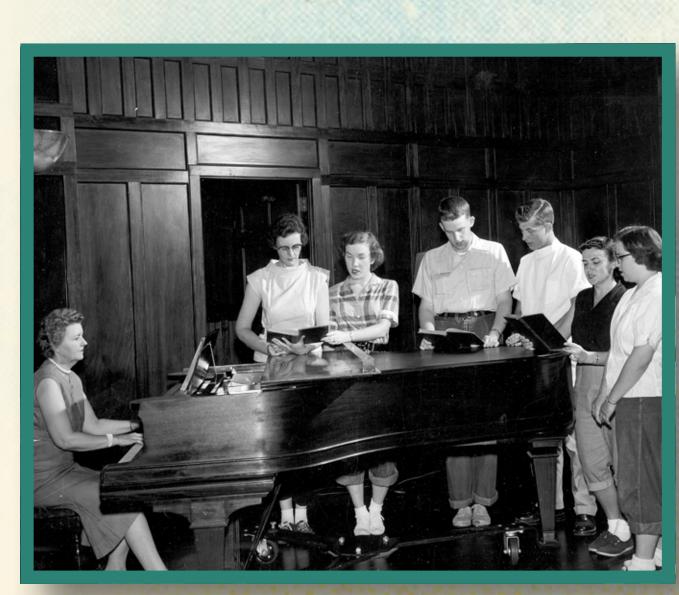

This photo was found behind a photo of Hilltop Cottage, the M.V. Moore estate at 227 Cumberland. It is believed this scene is an amateur theatrical in Montford Park. Edith "Bits" Moore stands seventh from the right (behind the dog), with her taller sister Pauline eighth from right, slightly behind her. They were daughters of Asheville merchant Matthew VanLear Moore and his wife Edith Clarke Moore. Pauline (1897-1979), married Francis Churchill Bourne. n.d.

346 Montford Avenue was designed by William Henry Lord and built c.1908 for George S. (& Alice) Powell. Powell was a wholesale grocer and an early developer of Montford, being president of the Asheville Loan Construction & Improvement Company. He is also said to have planted the first trees along Montford Avenue. The home was enlarged and used as Norburn Hospital 1927-1946. In 1948 the building was made into apartments. Riverside Park and Lake situated on the banks of the French Broad River were reached by electric cars (trolleys) that ran through Montford. It was a place of many amusements during the summer months. Lost in the great flood of 1916, the park was never rebuilt. Postcard 1915-1930
